(Re)Edit Competition

Cinema through images (video essays, recuts, mash-ups, remixes)

Rules and Regulations

With the introduction of digital media, the ability to quote, extract and remix cinematic images is significantly increased. In their digital, ubiquitous and dematerialized form, film images are highly malleable. Remixes, mash-ups and animated GIFs prove not only how easy it is to reuse film images today, but also the expressive power that they still hold in their new forms.

Film studies, criticism and analysis also use these new tools in increasingly effective ways. Online video essays – which began to spread approximately around 2005 – are works that study cinema through cinema, by editing and remixing film images: a kind practice made widely accessible to all thanks to a wide array of digital editing software. These works look at the history of archival film (including experimental found footage, film essays and documentaries on cinema) but are also “contaminated” by contemporary, hybrid and playful practices (mash-ups, re-cut trailers, supercuts, etc.). Currently, we are learning to do with images what we have always done with words, as proven by academics and critics Catherine Grant, Kevin B. Lee, Matt Zoller Seitz, kogonada, Adrian Martin and Cristina Álvarez López, just to name a few.

The Pesaro Film Festival has always focused on cinema as a form that thinks, and year after year has investigated not only new cinema, but also new forms of criticism, of innovative instruments and languages. By way of example, one could mention the retrospectives on Thom Andersen, with his striking reflections on the image conducted through the audiovisual form, and André S. Labarthe’s groundbreaking Cinéastes de notre temps; in 2015, a video essay workshop has explored for the first time in Italy video essays as an emerging forms of film criticism.

The Pesaro Film Festival will promote the thinking on cinema through images with a video essay competition for young filmmakers and film scholars.

The competition is open to foreign and Italian film school students and university students of all levels. Submissions can be analytical-didactic, poetic and reflexive, or playful – but they must invite us to see the images with new eyes, through original perspectives on the history, language and genres of any audiovisual form (cinema, TV series, music videos and so forth).
